Working with vulnerable families

Learn more about Community Hubs with these real-life examples. In this case study, Fahriye Yilmaz, coordinator of Coolaroo South Primary Hub, tells us how she established relationships with families in her Hub.

What was the challenge?

Families didn't know why we were here. They saw me as an interpreter who could deal with immediate issues, like how to fill out a lunch order. When I first started, my focus was on talking to families about the importance of being involved in their child's schooling and being part of school life. I began having informal morning and afternoon teas. From that we decided we needed to set up a playgroup for mothers and children.

What worked? What didn't?

We used to use the school's multipurpose room for playgroups and that was hard because we had to set things up and pack them away each time. It's really crucial that the school's leadership team helps you to create spaces for forums.

Now we have our own space, a family room with a kitchenette and an enclosed el fresco area, where we run playgroup and families can use anytime.

"Empathy is the biggest part of a Hub worker's role."

Your advice?

Having a central space that belongs to families has given more structure and meaning to our activities. It breaks down family isolation. It's really helped empower a lot of our women. Many have gone on to do courses.

Produced by the Centre for Community Child Health, January 2014

Community Hubs is a national program that links families and their preschool children to services and support, learning opportunities or the wider community. Community Hubs makes it easier for families to access the assistance they need by bringing local education, health, community and settlement information and services into a familiar and friendly place such as a school or community space.

Community Hubs is funded by the Australian Government in partnership with the Scanlon Foundation, the Migration Council Australia and Refuge of Hope.
